Laying hens need 2.5% to 3.5% calcium in their feed, which is higher than other chickens. The calcium will help provide the proper nutrients to support healthy eggs. Offer this calcium to your hens separately from their regular feed, so that they can consume it at their own pace. For good sources of calcium, consider:

How to Feed Laying Hens: 11 Steps (with Pictures) - wikiHow

Chickens live eight years on average, but hens only productively lay eggs in the first two, maybe three years of their lives. And on the commercial level, it's closer to two years, and sometimes less. When hens are productively laying eggs, they'll lay one egg about every 22 hours. As they get older, this becomes less and less frequent.
